

Deconstructing the Identity and Roles of 'Agents' under the United States' Foreign Corrupt Practices Act: What Nigerian Public Officials, Middlemen and Consultants Must Know

Honourable Justice Kenneth Amadi* and Jude Odinkonigbo

Abstract

Corruption is a global problem. Its impact is made more manifest with the advancement in the use of technology. The implication is that the scourge can be easily exported from one country to another if decisive actions are not taken to curb it. The United States is unarguably the commercial capital of the world. United States businesses have tremendous influence throughout the globe. To ensure that American businesses are not vehicles for the spread of corruption involving foreign public officials but rather to safeguard their reputations and maintain public confidence, probity, and integrity in the global business ecosystem, the Congress enacted the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act (FCPA). The scope of the Act is wide with global reach – to the extent that foreign persons or companies could be held liable for violating the Act. 'Agents' of US businesses in foreign countries like Nigeria or Nigerian businesses registered with the United States Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC), involved in corrupt practices outside the US, could be held liable under the Act. Equally, United States principals may be held vicariously liable for the conduct of their Nigerian agents. This paper explores, briefly, the application of the FCPA and what it takes for a foreign person or company to be adjudged an agent. As a result, United States businesses are advised on the steps to take before appointing a Nigerian agent and what a prospective agent in Nigeria must know to avoid exposing itself and its US principal to liability while dealing with Nigerian public officials. This is also necessary to escape the hammer of the United States Department of Justice (DOJ) and/or SEC and also save Nigerian officials from bad press and possible prosecution in their own jurisdiction.

Keywords: Corruption; United States; US Department of Justice; US Securities and Exchange Commission; Foreign Public Officials; Nigerian Agents

1. Introduction and Background

The payment of bribes to influence the acts or decisions of foreign officials, foreign political parties or candidates for foreign political office is unethical. But not only is it unethical, it is bad business as well. It erodes public confidence in the integrity of the free market system. In short, it rewards corruption instead of efficiency and puts pressure on ethical enterprises to lower their standards or risk losing business¹.

The Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) estimates that the cost of corruption equals more than 5 percent of the global Gross Domestic Product (GDP), with some US$1 trillion paid in bribes each year.² The World Economic Forum reports that corruption increases the cost of doing business by up to 10 percent.³ It is obvious that globalisation powered by advancement in technology has facilitated increased interactions amongst the global community. At the same time, it has occasioned and facilitated cross-border corruption in the form of bribery, insider trading, money laundering etc. Paying foreign officials for expediting legal processes or obtaining contracts was a common global business practice for many years and even well into the 1970s. Corporations wrote off bribes as regular business expenses when filing their annual returns. This did not however make the practice either desirable or ethical.

* PhD (Nig.); LL.M (Imo). Dr. Amadi is a Justice of the Court of Appeal of the Federal Republic of Nigeria.

 PhD (Osgoode); LL.M (Yale); LL.M (Dalhousie). Dr. Odinkonigbo is a Senior Lecturer at the Faculty of Law of the University of Nigeria, Enugu Campus. He is the current Head, Department of Property Law, Faculty of Law, University of Nigeria and a Counsel with Templars, a tier one Nigerian Commercial Law Firm.

¹ The United States House of Representatives, '1977 Legislative History - House Report' <<https://www.justice.gov/sites/default/files/criminal-fraud/legacy/2010/04/11/houseprt-95-640.pdf>> accessed 04 April 2022.

The aftermath of the Watergate Scandal led to several political reforms within the United States. The allegations of corruption surrounding United States officials connected with the administration of President Richard Nixon spurred the United States Securities and Exchange Commission to conduct an investigation into the allegations of foreign corruption involving United States businesses and individuals. The investigations revealed that United States officials had spent hundreds of millions of dollars bribing foreign officials to secure businesses abroad. These circumstances led to the enactment of the United States Foreign Corrupt Practices Act.

2. Overview of the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act of 1977 (FCPA)⁴

The purport of the FCPA is to prohibit the making of corrupt payments of money or giving of ‘anything of value’ to foreign public officials in exchange for obtaining or retaining business or directing business to a third party. Companies may violate the FCPA if they give payments or gifts to third parties, such as an official’s family members, as an indirect way of corruptly influencing a foreign official. The objectives of the FCPA include safeguarding the reputation of US businesses abroad and maintaining public confidence in the integrity of markets. The Act also discourages harmful corruption overseas. The term ‘anything of value’ is not defined by the FCPA. However, the same term has been used in other US bribery statutes and the courts have broadly interpreted it to include both tangible and intangible things that have value or perceived to have value by the parties or defendant(s). For instance, cash, gifts, use of materials, facilities or equipment, training and education, entertainment, meals and drinks, transportation, sex, and cancellation of debt, have been held to fall within the definition of ‘anything of value’. In United States v Moore,⁵ the Court rejected the defendant’s objection to instruction defining sex as a ‘thing of value’, which ‘unambiguously covers intangible considerations’. In United States v Gorman,⁶ the Court held that loans and promises of future employment are ‘things of value’. Also, in United States v Williams,⁷ the Court approved a jury instruction that stock

² Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, ‘11th Annual International Bar Association Anti-Corruption Conference: Opening Remarks by Angel Gurría, OECD Secretary-General’ <<https://www.oecd.org/about/secretary-general/11th-annual-international-bar-association-anti-corruption-conference.htm>> accessed April 04 2022.

³ Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, ‘CleanGovBiz: Integrity in Practice’ <<https://www.oecd.org/competition/50350066.pdf>> accessed 04 April 2022.

⁴ 15 U.S.C. §§ 78dd-1.

⁵ 525 F.3d 1033, 1048 (11th Cir. 2008).

⁶ 807 F.2d 1299, 1304-05 (6th Cir. 1986).

⁷ 705 F.2d 603, 622-23 (2d Cir. 1983).

could be a 'thing of value' if the defendant believed it had value, even though the shares had no commercial value, and noting that '[t]he phrase "anything of value" in bribery and related statutes has consistently been given a broad meaning'.

Further, it is immaterial if anything of value is 'small' in size or 'negligible'. There is no threshold set out in the FCPA to determine the amount or size of anything of value before a defendant is held liable to have violated the statute. Since the Department of Justice and SEC have not in recent times exercised their discretion in taking up any defendant who offered or promised to offer anything of value considered small in size, guidance can be sought on how the US Courts have interpreted other US bribery statutes that incorporated the same term without setting out a threshold for its determination. In United States v. Franco,⁸ the Court affirmed the bribery conviction of an inmate for paying a correctional officer $325 to obtain a cell phone, food, and marijuana, and noting that 18 U.S.C. § 201 does not contain a minimum monetary threshold. In United States v. Williams,⁹ the Court affirmed a bribery conviction for a $70 bribe to a vehicle inspector.¹⁰ Further, the involvement of intermediaries does not insulate companies from FCPA violations, since it is a violation of the FCPA to make a payment to a third party knowing or firmly believing that all or part of the payment or thing of value will be offered or provided to a foreign official. Knowing is defined under the Act to include a conscious disregard and wilful blindness.

3. The Key Provisions of the FCPA

The FCPA has both anti-bribery and accounting provisions. The anti-bribery provisions apply to issuers of publicly traded securities registered pursuant to Section 12(b) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934, United States citizens or residents and businesses that have their principal place of business in the United States, or foreign entities who engage in any act in furtherance of a corrupt payment while within the territory of the United States. The FCPA defines a foreign official to be an officer or employee of a foreign government, whether high or low in rank. It also includes employees of any foreign state-owned enterprise and a foreign political party, party official or candidate, as well as officials or employees of public international organizations or any person acting in an official capacity on behalf of any department, agency, or instrumentality of a foreign government.¹¹ A defendant must act corruptly to fall within the provisions of the Act concerning intent to wrongfully influence the

⁸ 632 F.3d 880, 882-84 (5th Cir. 2011).

⁹ 216 F.3d 1099, 1103 (D.C. Cir. 2000).

¹⁰ See also the case of United States v. Traitz 871 F.2d 368, 396 (3rd Cir. 1989) where the Court affirmed a bribery conviction for a $100 bribe paid to an official of the Occupational Health and Safety Administration. In United States v. Hsieh Hui Mei Chen, 754 F.2d 817, 822 (9th Cir. 1985), the Court affirmed a bribery conviction including a $100 bribe to an immigration official. In United States v. Bishton, 463 F.2d 887, 889 (D.C. Cir. 1972), the Court affirmed a bribery conviction for a $100 bribe to a Division Chief of the District of Columbia Sewer Operations Division.

¹¹ Bryan Cave and Leighton Paisner, 'Who is a Foreign Official under the FCPA? US Appeals Court Affirms Government Reading of Instrumentality' Lexology (9 May 2014) <<https://www.lexology.com/library/detail.aspx?g=6370ebb3-6aff-4548-9491-dee776ffb12b>> accessed 05 April 2022.

recipient or to assist any person in obtaining or retaining a benefit. The bribe does not need to have been completed to be in violation of the Act, so long as it was offered or authorized.

The Act provides a narrow exception for ‘grease payments’ made to facilitate or expedite the performance of a routine governmental action. Often, there is always a thin line between facilitation or grease payment and bribe. The thin line could be blurred even when such payment is routine. The size of the payment is not determinative of whether it is a facilitation payment, but the law views larger payments as more likely to have a corrupt intent. In 2004, a Swiss offshore drilling company, recorded payments to customs agent in the subsidiary’s ‘facilitating payment’¹² account, even though company personnel believed the payments were, in fact, bribes. The company was charged with violating both the FCPA’s anti-bribery and accounting provisions.¹³

The FCPA provides two affirmative defenses. The ‘local law defence’ and the ‘reasonable and bona fide expenditure defence’. Under the local law defence¹⁴, a defendant may prove that the bribe was legal under the foreign country’s written laws. The reasonable and bona fide expenditure defense applies to business-related expenses, such as a foreign official’s travel and lodging, if directly related to the demonstration or performance of a company’s services. The defendant must establish that the payment was lawful under the foreign country’s written laws and regulations at the time it was made. The fact that bribes may not be prosecuted under local law is not generally sufficient to establish the defence. In practice, the local law defense arises infrequently, as the written laws and regulations of countries rarely, if ever, permit corrupt payments. Nevertheless, if a defendant can establish that conduct that otherwise falls within the scope of the FCPA’s anti-bribery provisions was lawful under written local law, s/he would have a defence to prosecution.

The FCPA’s accounting provisions require accurate book and record keeping in a reasonable level of detail and devising and maintaining adequate internal accounting controls sufficient to provide reasonable assurance that the company’s policies are followed and that the company’s books and records are accurate. This way, corporations are unable to conceal bribes in their accounts or use corporate funds for wrongful purposes. The Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) and Department of Justice (DoJ) have the responsibility of enforcement under the Act. While the DOJ has criminal enforcement authority, the SEC has civil enforcement authority. In practice, most FCPA investigations are settled and do not usually lead to a court conviction. FCPA settlements often require the subject corporation to pay criminal and civil penalties amounting to millions of dollars. The DoJ and SEC consider several factors when deciding whether to initiate or resolve corporate investigations under the FCPA.

¹² For companies also doing business in the United Kingdom, the making of facilitation payments is barred by the UK Bribery Act.

¹³ United States v Vecto Gray Control Inc and Anor. 15 U.S.C. §§ 78dd-2, 78dd-3.

¹⁴ In the United States v Kozeny 667 F.3d 122 (2d Cir. 2011), the defendant unsuccessfully sought to assert the local law defense regarding the law of Azerbaijan. The court ruled that the defendant could not invoke the FCPA’s affirmative defense because Azeri law did not actually legalize bribe payment.

4. Applications of the FCPA

Every US company that operates abroad must have a compliance programme that reinforces anti-corruption standards and seeks to prevent violations of the FCPA before they occur. Performing due diligence on business partners, agents and other third parties in respect of whose acts a US company or issuer could be held vicariously liable is one of the most important aspects of an FCPA compliance program. A breach of the provisions of the FCPA will lead to the imposition of heavy fines. Companies that violate the FCPA also run the risk of being prohibited from doing business with the US government. FCPA investigations often drag on for years and may consume the resources of key company personnel, disrupt a company's operations, and cause serious reputational harm to the company.¹⁵

5. 'Agents' under the FCPA: Who are They and What are Their Roles?

Certain persons – both artificial and natural – are subject to the FCPA's jurisdiction. The US Congress limits the categories of entities and individuals subject to the jurisdiction of the FCPA. The following entities or individuals are liable to penalties for wrongful conduct(s) under the FCPA: (1) U.S. citizens/nationals and residents; (2) foreign persons who violate the provisions of the FCPA while in the US; (3) companies that have issued publicly traded securities in the United States or have reporting obligations under the US Securities Exchange Act; (4) companies organized under the laws of, or with their principal place of business in, the United States.

In the last two of the categories, the FCPA jurisdiction is extended to U.S companies' officers, directors, employees, agents and stockholders acting on the companies' behalf. It does not matter where the violation of the FCPA provisions occurred – it could be within or outside the US.¹⁶ It is relatively clear what the terms 'officer', 'director', 'employee', and 'stockholder' stand for. But same cannot be said of the term 'agent'. Unfortunately, the FCPA does not provide a definition for this term. However, the DoJ and SEC appear to have incorporated the doctrine of agency in the interpretation of the term, since the legislative history of the FCPA appears to suggest that the Congress might have intended to target third-party intermediaries engaged to pay bribes to foreign officials. The determination of who an agent is through the prism of agency examines the presence or purported presence of control by parent companies over their oversea subsidiaries and their officials or persons hired by the subsidiaries to deliver. The Resource Guide to the US FCPA (second edition) notes that:

The fundamental characteristic of agency is control. Accordingly, DOJ and SEC evaluate the parent's control — including the parent's knowledge and direction of the

¹⁵ On 8 January, 2021, the Securities and Exchange Commission announced charges against Deutsche Bank AG for violations of the FCPA. It was found that Deutsche Bank had engaged foreign officials, their relatives, and their associates as third-party intermediaries, business development consultants, and finders to obtain and retain global business. As part of coordinated resolutions with the SEC and the Department of Justice, Deutsche Bank agreed to pay more than $120 million, which includes more than $43 million to settle the SEC's charges. Release No. 90875 and Release No. 4201 of January 8, 2021. Case Number 04-cv-06909

¹⁶ 15 U.S.C. §§78dd-1, 778d-2.

subsidiary's actions, both generally and in the context of the specific transaction — when evaluating whether a subsidiary is an agent of the parent.¹⁷

The implication of the above is that once a subsidiary is found to be an agent of its parent, the subsidiary's conduct and knowledge are imputed to the parent under the doctrine of Respondeat Superior.¹⁸ Also, the conducts of the subsidiary's staff, consultants and/or agents in the course of their employments or engagements which violate the provisions of the FCPA are attributable to the subsidiary and by extension to the parent under the doctrine.¹⁹ Thus, agents under the FCPA include subsidiaries of US Companies, consultants, distributors, joint-venture partners, lawyers and any other intermediary between a parent company or subsidiary and a third party. A corporation will be held vicariously liable for any crime their employees or agents commit anywhere in the world while acting within the scope of their employments. It does not matter if the employee or agent was high ranking and/or was specifically instructed not to engage in the wrongful conduct.

In October 2020, the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) announced charges against The Goldman Sachs Group Inc. for violations of the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act (FCPA) in connection with the 1 Malaysia Development Berhad (1MDB) bribe scheme²⁰. According to the SEC's order, beginning in 2012, former senior employees of Goldman Sachs used a third-party intermediary to bribe high-ranking government officials in Malaysia and the Emirate of Abu Dhabi. The company agreed to pay $2.9 billion to settle the SEC's charges.²¹

Companies doing business in a foreign country usually engage a local individual or company to help them conduct business. Though these agents provide legitimate advice on local procedures and, perhaps, help facilitate business transactions, both parent companies and their subsidiaries should be aware of the risks involved in engaging third-party agents or intermediaries. The fact that a bribe is paid by a third party does not eliminate the potential for criminal or civil liability under the FCPA. In January 2021, Charles Cain, the Chief of the SEC's FCPA Enforcement Unit stated that: 'while third parties may assist in legitimate business development activities, it is critical that companies have sufficient internal accounting controls in place to prevent payments to third parties in furtherance of improper purposes'.²² A vast majority of FCPA enforcement actions have involved, in some way, improper conduct by third parties acting on behalf of the targeted companies. Any third-party performing work on behalf of the company must be fully vetted and continually monitored for FCPA red flags. Some of the common red flags associated with the use of third-party agents include:

1. The third-party is paid from improperly accounted funds of the company;
2. The third party is often given excessive commissions;

¹⁷ The United States' Department of Justice, 'The Resource Guide to the US' FCPA, Second Edition' 28.

¹⁸ ibid, 27 – 28.

¹⁹ See In the Matter of Alcoa Release No. 3525 (Jan. 9, 2014).

²⁰ United States Securities and Exchange Commission, 'SEC Enforcement Actions: FCPA Cases' <<https://www.sec.gov/enforce/sec-enforcement-actions-fcpa-cases>> accessed 05 April 2022.

²¹ United States Securities and Exchange Commission, 'SEC Charges Goldman Sachs with FCPA Violations' <<https://www.sec.gov/news/press-release/2020-265>> accessed 06 April 2022. The company also agreed to pay more than $4 billion to financial regulators in Malaysia, the UK, Hong Kong and Singapore to settle the charges.

²² Accountancy Daily, 'Deutsche Bank Pays $120m to Settle Bribery Charges' <<https://www.accountancydaily.co/deutsche-bank-pays-120m-settle-bribery-charges>> accessed 05 April 2022

3. Unreasonably large discounts to third-party distributors;
4. Third-party 'consulting agreements' that include only vaguely described services;
5. The third-party consultant is in a different line of business than that for which it has been engaged;
6. The third-party is related to or closely associated with a foreign official;
7. The third-party is merely a shell company incorporated in an offshore jurisdiction; and
8. The third-party requests payment to offshore bank accounts.

The degree of third-party vetting will depend on the nature of the services provided, the amount of expected government interaction, and the jurisdictions the third party will operate in. At the least, pre-engagement due diligence should be conducted while anti-bribery and anti-corruption language should be incorporated into the terms of the contracts. As long as the US company is aware that the agent is engaging in the wrongful conduct or has a belief that such circumstance exists or is substantially certain to occur, then the company will be said to have violated the FCPA.

In recent years, there have been a number of FCPA cases involving the Nigerian authorities. In 2012, TSKJ, a four-company joint venture consisting of Technip S.A.,²³ Snamprogetti Netherlands B.V.,²⁴ Kellogg Brown & Root Inc. (KBR),²⁵ and JGC Corporation,²⁶ was found to have used two agents – a British lawyer²⁷ and a Japanese trading company Marubeni Corporation – to bribe Nigerian government officials in order to win a series of liquefied natural gas construction projects. The companies were all found guilty of FCPA violations. The companies and the Japanese corporation together paid $1.7 billion in civil and criminal sanctions for this violation²⁸. In United States v Bilfinger,²⁹ Bilfinger's Nigerian subsidiary entered into a consortium agreement with entities affiliated with Willbros Group Inc. to bid for and execute the Eastern Gas Gathering System (EGGS) project, a natural gas pipeline system in the Niger Delta designed to relieve existing pipeline capacity constraints. Between 2003 and 2005, Bilfinger used contractual payments, fraudulent loans, and petty cash obtained by fraudulent invoices to funnel money to two 'consultants' for the purposes of bribing Nigerian officials to obtain and retain the EGGS contracts. As a consequence of this, Bilfinger was fined the sum of $32 million. In addition to the monetary penalty, Bilfinger agreed to retain an independent compliance monitor for 18 months.

In United States v Parker Drilling Co.,³⁰ Parker Drilling (Nigeria) Limited, a wholly owned subsidiary of Parker Drilling Co. failed to pay some custom tariffs and duties. The

²³ United States v Technip S.A., No. 10-cr-439 (S.D. Tex. June 28, 2010); SEC v Technip, No. 10-cv-2289 (S.D. Tex. June 28, 2010)

²⁴ United States v Snamprogetti Netherlands B.V., No. 10-cr-460 (S.D. Tex. Jul. 7, 2010).

²⁵ United States v Kellogg Brown & Root LLC, No. 09-cr-71 (S.D. Tex. Feb. 6, 2009).

²⁶ United States v JGC Corp., No. 11-cr-260 (S.D. Tex. Apr. 6, 2011).

²⁷ The United States Department of Justice, 'UK Solicitor Pleads Guilty for Role in Bribing Nigerian Government Officials as Part of KBR Joint Venture Scheme' <<https://www.justice.gov/opa/pr/uk-solicitor-pleads-guilty-role-bribing-nigerian-government-officials-part-kbr-joint-venture>> accessed 05 April 2022.

²⁸ SEC v Technip No. 12-cr-22 (S.D. Tex. Jan. 17, 2012 (15 U.S.C. § 78dd-2/ 18 U.S.C. § 371); United States v JGC Corp., No. 4:11-cr00260 (S.D. Tex. 2011).

²⁹ SE, No. 4:13-cr-00745 (S.D. Tex. 2013).

³⁰ No. 1:13-cr-00176 (E.D. Va. 2013).

Nigerian custom authorities imposed a fine on the company. Parker Drilling allegedly retained a Nigerian agent to help resolve the customs issues. The company authorized payments to this Nigerian agent totalling $1.25 million. The Nigerian agent used those funds, in part, to ‘entertain Nigerian government officials’ involved with the customs issues. Subsequently, the fine was reduced by about 80%. The company was charged with violating the anti-bribery provisions of the FCPA and the company had to pay a monetary penalty of $11,760,000. In United States v Shell Nigeria Exploration & Production Company Limited (SNEPCO),³¹ SNEPCO was found to have paid bribes to its subcontractors and agents for customs clearance services with the knowledge and intent that some of the money was to reimburse the subcontractors for moneys paid to Nigerian customs officials to import materials and equipment into Nigeria. The bribes were falsely characterized by SNEPCO in its internal books and records as legitimate customs clearance charges and these charges were, in turn, consolidated into Shell’s books, records, and accounts. SNEPCO agreed to pay a penalty of $30 million.

It is understandable that US companies may need agents’ local knowledge to navigate through the murky waters of business in new and challenging markets, but the engagement of such agents for the furtherance of improper purpose(s) will fall short of the expectations of the FCPA and therefore will be penalised under the Act. Most of the FCPA violations in Nigeria did involve the use of agents - such as consultants, intermediaries, advisers, joint-venture partners, distributors and other third-parties. These agents, on behalf of US companies or their local subsidiaries, usually facilitate bribing of Nigerian government officials, politicians³², political parties³³ and government agencies for the benefits of parent companies or subsidiaries. The consequences of FCPA violations could be dire and costly. It may include both criminal and civil fines running into billions of US dollars. The amounts may represent disgorgement, interest, and penalties followed by cease-and-desist orders. Criminal violations of the FCPA can also attract imprisonment for company officials and/or agents of the defaulting company. For Nigerian public officials, getting involved in FCPA violation will obviously attract very bad publicity. Generally, the DoJ may not prosecute a bribe-taking foreign public official as an accomplice or conspirator in an FCPA violation that took place outside the United States,³⁴ but the Nigerian government could prosecute such officials in Nigeria based on revelations exposed by US investigation teams.

To avoid FCPA violations, especially as it relates to Nigerian subsidiaries and agents who may think it is business as usual, a US parent company must take affirmative steps to avoid FCPA infractions. For instance, a parent company must ensure that its subsidiaries, officials and agents of the subsidiaries in Nigeria receive trainings on FCPA requirements; establish for the subsidiaries effective FCPA compliance programs; and training on

³¹ No. 4:10-cr 767 (S.D. Tex. 2010).

³² In Re Paradigm B.V. (2007).

³³ In the case of United States of America v Halliburton and Kellogg Brown and Root LLC, 15 U.S.C. § 78dd-2, the U.S. regulators held that a ‘donation’ made to a Nigerian political party had been paid to influence the award of a government contract. The company used its agent to pay $5 million to a Nigerian political party. The payments were made to the agent in suitcases of cash and, in one instance, the trunk of a car when the cash did not fit into a suitcase.

³⁴ US v Hoskin 902 F.3d 69 (2d Cir. 2018).

maintenance of accurate books and records. Doing this, with prior due diligence conducted on prospective agents, will save US companies and their subsidiaries lots of troubles that could arise as consequences of FCPA violations.

Conclusion

The US Congress enacted the FCPA in 1977 to prohibit and/or halt corrupt or improper payments to foreign officials in exchange of obtaining or retaining business(es). This Act is designed to restore public confidence in commercial transactions involving US businesses by promoting reliable and corrupt-free environments both within and outside the US – provided that in cross-border transactions, a US business or its agents, is involved. It is convenient to say that this 44-year-old Act is one piece of a legislation that has fostered fair business practices within and outside the United States. Till date, the Act is the main legal instrument used by the American Government to address issues of unethical conduct and corrupt practices perpetrated in jurisdictions outside the US involving American businesses, their subsidiaries and/or agents. Precedents show that most parent companies and their subsidiaries resort to the use of third-party agents, who often are hired as consultants, to conceal their (the parents') involvement in bribing or compromising foreign officials. Fortunately, under the FCPA, acts or conduct performed by agents as proxies for parent companies, which acts or conduct the parent companies or their subsidiaries would ordinarily not do, are attributed to them (parent companies). These parent companies and subsidiaries are prohibited from relying on ignorance of the activities of their agents – provided the agents acted within the scope of their engagement. Therefore, parent companies are advised to ensure that their subsidiaries and/or agents are sufficiently trained on FCPA compliance, and due diligence concerning agents' knowledge of the FCPA should be carried out before they are engaged.